Professional designers If you have a design background and can start from scratch and be creative, creating beautiful, usable Web pages is an exceptional skill to have. The fact that a designer can work with a color palette and technical ability to tell the Web what she wants is a distinct advantage. A good designer is familiar with the Web and its features. She should know what browsers use and what standards are being used. She should understand HTML and FTP. She should be able to create a style sheet, select the most appropriate CSS-based format, and then code it from scratch. Some designers are also into print design. Having solid printing skills gives a designer a great advantage. The graphic artist can deliver a finished product that an ordinary Web designer can't. Don't discount the value of being able to write CSS code and use HTML or to understand code that someone else created, even if the code is from an open source page generator (such as Drupal,

Stanford University neurobiologist Marvin Chun is working with a robot on the college campus of North Carolina A&T State University to develop new methods for detecting early glioblastoma. In his lab, a tiny robot named Josephine, called a Von Neumann machine, can sniff out hidden tumours in rabbits. Chun, a professor of pathology and biomedical sciences at Stanford and the Howard Hughes Medical Institute, will use the robot's help to develop new methods for early glioblastoma detection. It's a brain cancer that begins in a glial (nerve) cell in a part of the brain called the brainstem, then spreads out through the brain tissue to take over normal brain cells. It is the most common of the different types of brain tumours. Current detection methods can miss diagnoses early in the disease, when the tumour is confined to only a small part of the brain. It can take months, or even years, to detect it, and the blood in the brain can mask the telltale signs of tumour, making the diagnosis by conventional means difficult. Chun's research is expected to improve the detection of the disease, and more quickly. Chun's lab already developed a method to detect tumours using biochemistry, called Sympathy for Cancer Detection. In December, Chun discovered that adult stem cells produce a chemical signature unique to the cells and tumours that originate in the neuroectoderm, the part of the brain that goes from the spinal cord to the brainstem. This chemical fingerprint can then be used as a diagnostic tool. The method was applied to test samples of fetal stem cells, fetal brains and human glioblastoma cells. It was also validated by using neuroectoderm-derived stem cells from mice, human patients, and pig brains. The results, published in Cell, suggest that the technique can be applied to non-human brains and also suggests that it is applicable to patients. Josephine, a small two-legged robot with a nose like a wasp, is used in Chun's lab to explore neuroectodermal cell-derived chemical fingerprints. In the video above, you can see Josephine feeding on an animal model of Glioblastoma, a brain cancer found in adults. The robot is not currently fitted with any toxic chemicals. It can actually smell the difference between the cancerous and non-cancerous cells.

Nutrient, mineral, and trace metal concentrations in fresh and sold or frozen fish and sea food in Oslo, Norway, in 2005. The aim of this study was to assess the levels of major nutrients, trace elements, and essential elements in fresh and frozen fish and sea food in Oslo, Norway, in 2005. Samples of herring (n=96), salmon (n=94), mackerel (n=41), whitefish (n=39), cod (n=40), skate (n=27), tuna (n=23), and herring roe (n=30) were collected by the local Food Surveillance Department. Fresh fish and sea food were also purchased at local fish markets. We found that average fresh fish and sea food was within the range of values recommended by the Norwegian Directorate of Health; however, with the exception of magnesium and vitamin B(12), average levels of some trace elements were below the levels recommended by international authorities. No systematic differences were detected between fresh and frozen products. In summary, our results demonstrate that different elements may not be adequate biomarkers for assessing the nutritional quality of fish.

I've successfully tested my DAO and I'm now trying to write a test for my service. The issue is that this service is injected by Spring with an instance of WorkDao, which is referenced in the service. To setup my test, I want to mock the service, and I need to also mock the WorkDao to ensure that the code I'm testing works as expected. The issue is that if I mock the WorkDao, I won't have access to the injected service. I'm thinking I can create a mock of WorkDao and have it return an instance that will be used by the service to do the work, but I can't seem to get the service dependency to work. Here's my service
